

KING TUT & THE GOLDEN AGE OF THE PHARAOHS

June 10, 2010

The epic world tour of King Tut's treasures was thought to have left America forever, but it is returning for an encore exhibition in Times Square in Manhattan. Once again you can explore amazing artifacts from the Golden Age of the Pharaohs, which fill ten galleries. Afterward, enjoy free time for sightseeing, power shopping, or fine dining. Miss this chance to see the boy king's treasures, and we'll have to say: tut, tut!

Arriving in Manhattan around 10:30 AM, head straight to the Discovery Exposition in Times Square in the former New York Times Building to delight in the "King Tut and the Golden Age of the Pharaohs" exhibition. Through ten galleries and 130 artifacts, you will relive the amazing discovery of Tut's tomb in 1922 and explore the funerary practices of Ancient Egypt. Among the wealth of treasures, see a coffinette that held some of the mummified remains of the boy king as well as the diadem placed on the mummy's head more than 3,000 years ago. You will be following in the footsteps of more than seven million people around the world who have viewed these wonders! When you're finished inspecting treasures belonging to a mummy, enjoy free time for lunch (on your own), for taking in the sights in this famous part of Manhattan, or for a little power shopping in flagship stores, including the huge Toys "R" Us in Times Square, with its indoor Ferris Wheel.
